A close-up photograph of a classical architectural detail, showing a column capital (likely Corinthian) supporting an entablature. The capital is decorated with acanthus leaves and scrolls. Above the capital, a stone block features the inscription "FACOL". The structure is made of light-colored stone or marble, showing signs of age and weathering. To the left, a brick wall is visible.

A close-up photograph of a classical building facade. The image focuses on a large, ornate capital, likely a Composite or Corinthian style, which supports a heavy entablature. The capital is decorated with acanthus leaves and scrolls. The entablature above it features a prominent frieze. The building's masonry is made of light-colored stone or brick. To the right, a portion of a window with a white frame is visible. The sky in the background is a clear, pale blue.
